Description

Between 1885 and 1895, Rabindranath Tagore spent extended periods in rural Bengal, overseeing his family's estates in places like Sheldaidaha, Patisar, and Shazadpur (now in Bangladesh). During this time, he wrote a series of personal letters, mostly addressed to family members and close friends. These letters, later selected and translated by Tagore himself in Glimpses of Bengal, offer vivid portraits of village life, natural beauty, and human relationships in colonial Bengal.

U2-T2. Message to the Modern World by an Indian Chief (Script)

Description

In 1854, Chief Seattle delivered a letter (often misrepresented as a speech) to the then-President of the United States, Franklin Pierce, following a request by the U.S. government to purchase his tribe's land for the purpose of expanding the American frontier. The context of the letter is tied to the encroachment of settlers on Native American lands and the forced relocation of tribes as part of broader U.S. government policies such as the Indian Removal Act.
